A Helicopter That Changed Aviation

First developed in the 1950s, the UH-1 Huey was designed as a versatile utility and medical evacuation helicopter. Its reliability, lifting power, and adaptability quickly made it the backbone of helicopter operations for decades.

The Huey became known for moving people where airplanes could not, delivering aid, evacuating the injured, and providing transportation in challenging environments. Its distinctive sound and silhouette remain instantly recognizable around the world.

Meet "Greyhound" 66-01126

The Michigan Flight Museum's Huey, UH-1H 66-01126, is affectionately known as "Greyhound."

Purchased by the U.S. Army in 1967, this helicopter served in Vietnam with the 240th Assault Helicopter Company, whose transport platoons used the call sign "Greyhound." The unit's unofficial slogan, "Go Greyhound and leave the flying to us," led to a unique partnership with the Greyhound Bus Company, which sent care packages to troops overseas.

Delivered to the Michigan Flight Museum in 2019, Greyhound 66-01126 now offers passengers a rare chance to fly in a helicopter that still does exactly what it was built to do.

Fly in it. Feel it. Remember it.
Don't go out. Go up.
